Statement on the North Carolina House Budget

North Carolina is facing a unique time in our budget history, with record state surpluses and an unprecedented amount of federal funding to support early childhood education and address issues facing young children, families, and communities. This funding presents opportunities to address long-standing structural problems and inequities in the early childhood system. We can and must ensure that children have access to quality early learning experiences, that parents can afford child care so that they can return to work, that early educators can afford to keep teaching, and that child care programs receive adequate funding to sustain their services.

The House budget, released on Tuesday August 10th, contains some bright spots for early childhood education, most notably, funding for Smart Start, NC Pre-K, Child Care Subsidy Assistance, and funding for the early childhood workforce. However, there is more that needs to be done to support struggling child care teachers and programs who have continued to stay open during the pandemic and support North Carolina’s young children, working families, and economic recovery.

Early educators are the workforce behind the workforce. Child care teachers have been on the frontlines of the COVID-19 crisis since day one, but they are paid poverty-level wages and few benefits for the essential work they do. Our state is facing an unprecedented workforce crisis, and professional compensation is needed now to attract and retain a high-quality workforce.

Child care programs have stepped up to stay open during the pandemic, often at considerable loss. A key way to stabilize child care programs is with more adequate and equitable child care subsidy reimbursement rates. This will help providers sustain their programs, pay teachers higher wages, and enhance program quality, and it would increase access for families by encouraging more providers to serve children receiving child care subsidies.

We look forward to working with North Carolina House and Senate leaders to continue to find ways to support young children, their families, and the child care system in the Joint Conference Committee. It is critical that the final state budget includes an investment in the long-term sustainability of our early education system, including funding for the early childhood workforce, improved child care subsidy rates, NC Pre-K expansion, and full implementation of the early childhood priorities in the Leandro comprehensive long-term plan.

These are all important pieces to ensure that child care teachers and programs are supported through the duration of this crisis and beyond, and to make child care more accessible for young children and working families across the state.
